CHANNEL ISLANDS

THE islands of Jersey (which is the largest and most important) and Guernsey and Alderney are termed by the Customs the Channel Islands, having a separate jurisdiction and freedom from Customs dues. The population of these islands in 1911 was 96,900.

The imports are coals and all articles of food from England and France. The principal articles of export are market garden and farm produce, principal among these being potatoes; grapes are also extensively grown and exported. The islands are also celebrated for their well-known breed of cattle, which are largely exported. About 300,000 tons of broken stones are exported annually, principally to London.

ROUTE.—Steamers run between Southampton and Jersey (which is distant about 122 miles) daily, calling at Guernsey en route, and there is likewise a daily service of steamers to and from Weymouth; there is regular communication between Granville, St. Malo and St. Helier, and during the summer with Carteret, via Gorey; many steamers leave London weekly with goods. There is also a service of steamers (cargo and passengers) twice weekly to and from Plymouth.
